WILDE AND SWING.

The Poet's Reply to the Pastor's Critt-

[Special Dispatch to the Herald.]

Oscar-Wilde CHICAGO, Ill., March 5, 1832. s smokin your cigarette when spondent saw him this afternoon in a Grand acific Hotel parlor. He wore a dove-colored ack coat of velvet, trimmed with drab silk vest to match, pantaloons of lightcolored Scotch tweed, shoes of patent leather and very pointed at the toe, neck dress of brilliant red and pocket handkerchief to match. "I am fond of sweet odors, I love perfumery passionately," he remarked as he paid a boy $4 who came into the room bearing six pint bottles of perfumery. Dictating in a deliberate, distinct utterance, he spoke as follows regarding the recent attack upon him in the Alliance: "Knowing or Prof. Swing as a brilliant man, I had hoped that his attack upon me would at least be brilliant; for, next to having a loyal friend, there is for me opleasure lake that to be found in having an intelligent enemy; simply because one can answer him. I was very much disappointed when I read it; for if a man has anything to say against the clothes I wear he should write to my tailor; and if he cares to speak uniavorably of flowers, which I think beautiful, he should address himself to my gardener; and, as regards his soleann attack upon me for receiving feos for the trouble of lecturing, nothing could, of course, be more foolish, coming from a practical man of the world, such as Proton and the state of the world as Proton and the state of the world of the more considers that it come is about of the more considers that it come is a body of men who receive large satures for a body of men who receive large satures for men who receive large satures for men who receive large satures for a body of men who receive large satures for an obly conclude that he neither attended nor read my lecture. Had he done so, he would have seen that I divided it into two parts. In the first part for good workmanship; that the ordinary for good workmanship; that the ordinary for good workmanship; that the ordinary workman worked with his hands and his heart. neck nd very pointed at the of brilliant red and pocket handkerchief to nto two parts. In the first said that the moral elements were necessity that the oral elements were necessity that the oral it into the moral elements which it is a said that the moral elements which for good workmanship; that the ordinary workman worked with his hands and his heart, if the work has any beauty at all, and that all good art rests on two things—truth and honesty; that work dishonestly done, or which pretended to be something else than what it really, was, such as the painting of wood to represent such as the painting of wood to represent marble, or the staining of paper to marble, or the staining of paper to marble, and the staining of the sta marble, or the staining of paper to represent stone, was all dead, bud art quite worthless and very nely. There is no better school for anybody than is to be found in work in art, for, while in the work about us the cheat and the liar may often gunpunished for a long time, if a man does un truthful work in art, he knows that he is bringing upon himself his own punishment that he will be found out and wort last. If the second part I dwelt on the effect that ar would have on ordinary men and women when do not work in art, but merely co would have on ordinary men and women would on to work in art, but merely enjoy it. I showed what its influence might be on children and that it might have nations. Now, as regards children, it would teach them to love the beauturi and the good and hate the evil and the usity quite naturally n a.. but its teach them to love the beautiful and the good and hate the evil and the ugity quite naturally and simply, the lesson coming to them so unconsciously and in such a joyous way that they would never forcet it. As regards the nation, I advance the thought that art, by producing a common intellectual atmosphere, might be laying a sure basis for some universal brother-hood of man and a humanity which would include all patriotism, and I reminded the andiancies of the control of the contro no sarer reson to show one than that ration hatreris are always strongest where civilizaties is lowest. I am very much surprised the any one bearing the name of David should fighting on the side of the Philistines. But should he be the first to take the pebble from the river brook and huri is at that monstre Calinth. of Chiesto, architecture, the the river brook and huri it at that monstrom Goiagh of Chicago architecture, the water tower, instead of calling it a calm and rationa building—two most unfortunate epithets. Em perhaps I am wrong in taking the learned pro-fessor so scriously to task, for of what I have read in American literature the sermons o your divines always seem to be humorous, and the writings of your humorists most depress-ing." and
